

A NOVEL OF MODERN MALABAR.

From The London Globe.
Not often is it one's luck to come across a real novelty in imaginative literature, but here we have such a treat. It is called "Indubia," and was originally written in Malayalam—the author being Mr. Chandu Menon. But for the information of the benighted few whose linguistic accomplishments do not include Malayalam, the work has been translated into English. The original, whose name is hardly known, is one of the rising men of the day. He seems to think that in its first shape the novel will be of much use to those who desire to become acquainted with the colloquial and idiomatic language of the country.

My interest in the volume springs from quite another source. If it be really true, as the scholarly translator says, "Modern Malabar" is depicted in all its grimness, it would be of value to some of European literati. For it is apparent that Mr. Chandu Menon has crammed himself most thoroughly with the current fiction of today. Here you have, exactly as in the English novel, the love-drama, the duel, the tale of matrimony, and down with a long discussion of atheism, and all the other stock themes, treated, however, with the oddest and most fantastic intermixtures of Indian and English habits of thought and expression. Indubia herself is the type of a modern intellectual cultured woman, who still is a Maharanee.

It is difficult by extract to give the flavor of this very unique book. Undoubtedly it is a transcript from the modern life of Brahmin and Muslim, and what character is more curious than such language as the author uses? "Sheave All Khan," "No," "none," said Mahayana, "and water up, running, bawling, shouting, bring some mutton chops and bread and cheese and sherry," said Sheave All Khan." That, I am told by one familiar with it, is modern Malabar to a T.
